Monday 4 September

Rose

I close the door with a little too much force; the slam reverberates throughout the house. In the instant that the bang disappears I notice the emptiness. A void. Silence. I consider shouting 'Hello' but I know there is no one to answer. The blankness shouldn't be a surprise. This is the third September I have returned to an empty home after a long summer break and noticed the all-consuming silence. The calm is partly a relief, partly heartbreaking. This year the hush is particularly distressing because I did not have to cajole, bribe, beg or threaten my boys to get them to surrender their vice-like grips at the school gate. This year, Sebastian ran into the playground without so much as a backward glance, let alone a kiss goodbye, and even Henry (normally the most openly affectionate twin) was only prepared to wave at me. From a distance.

Haven't I done a marvellous job? Excellent. Wonderful. I should be congratulated. I have produced confident, independent and secure boys. Well done me.

I think I'm going to cry.

I briefly consider pouring myself a glass of whisky. But dismiss the silly idea because in reality the only spirit in my cupboard is cooking sherry. I could have a glass of wine. I think there's half a bottle of Chablis in the fridge but I content myself with putting on the kettle. Strong coffee is the more sensible choice and I'm famed for my sensible nature.

The phone rings; its cheerful tring is a Red Cross parcel. I pick up hastily and gratefully.

'It's me.'

Me, in this case, is Connie, one of my best and oldest friends. She sounds tearful and I remember that it's her eldest daughter's first day at school.

'How was Fran's drop-off?'

'OK,' she mutters; she doesn't sound convinced. 'She looked amazing. The uniform is so cute. But . . .'

'But . . .?' I prompt.

'Is it usual for them to cling to your leg and sob? I couldn't pry her off; she was like a tiny monkey. She kept begging to come home with Flora and me. She even offered to tidy up her Barbies – that's unprecedented.' Connie is trying to laugh but I'm not fooled.

'Very usual,' I assure her. 'Do you fancy a coffee?'

'I want vodka, but I'll settle for coffee. I'll be with you in five. I'm just around the corner.'

If I round up, Connie and I have known each other for nearly twenty years, which is phenomenal and unbelievable. To have known someone that long must mean I'm a fully fledged adult, and digesting that fact requires a mountain of sugar, not a teaspoon. We originally met through my sister, Daisy. Daisy and Connie went to university together; they were very tight. Connie and I have only become particularly friendly in the last five or six years. We both have kids and, sadly, Daisy doesn't. I've found that kids pull you towards women that you would never have considered being friends with if you didn't have children in common – it's one of the perks of the job. Besides, Connie was very kind to me when my husband left me for one of our mutual friends.

The situation was officially ugly.

Connie was a great pal of Lucy, the mistress, but despite that she's managed to walk a diplomatic line and remain friends with both of us. Sometimes, I think I should have demanded that Connie take a more moralistic stance. I should have asked her to spurn her old buddy and my deceiving ex but I couldn't risk it. Friends were thin on the ground at the time and so few people are prepared to see the world in black and white. Extremism isn't fashionable. Not even extremely nice. People who are extremely nice are mistrusted or taken advantage of. Believe me, I'm talking from experience. So, I make do with knowing that Connie is a great friend to me and I ignore the fact that she's a great friend to Lucy as well.

Since Peter left, I've battled with every instinct when talking to Connie and somehow I've trained myself to make only casual, polite enquiries about Peter and Lucy. I do not allow myself the indulgence of ridiculing or vilifying them, which would embarrass and compromise her. I limit myself to the type of enquiry one makes after an old work colleague two people might have in common – civil, distant, even a little distracted – and I glean the occasional piece of choice information using this covert method.

Sometimes, in the early days, I couldn't help myself; little bits of pain or grief would eke out however tightly I tried to guard my feelings – and I'd mention Peter's name. I might have moaned about him or admitted I missed him. Yet I did this with the absolute certainty that I could trust Connie. She'd never, ever repeat to Lucy anything I say about him. This is a remarkable feat of self-restraint for anyone, but for Connie it's a breathtaking tribute to our friendship. Connie isn't discreet and it must kill her to keep mum. I've never allowed myself to reveal my true feelings about Lucy at all. The thing is I don't have the vocab – I don't like using expletives.

I don't worry that Lucy talks about me to Connie. I know that if she does Connie will be loyal and supportive of me, but I can't imagine the scenario ever arising. I don't think I've ever entered Lucy's consciousness, not even when she was eating Sunday roast at my house and giving my husband a quick blow-job in our cloakroom before I served up the pudding and coffee. She was always too busy giving literal meaning to the words 'Let's take an intercourse break' to think about me. I'm not glamorous enough to rank among her friends and I'm not rich enough to be her client. Therefore, I am beneath her notice.

True to her word, Connie arrives at my house within moments. I open the door and see that she's fighting tears.

'There is something worse than them clinging to your leg and begging you not to leave, you know,' I comment.

Connie plonks Flora, her youngest, on the kitchen floor and sits on a bar stool; she reaches for the biscuit tin.

'What's worse?'

'Sebastian and Henry literally skipped away from me this morning. Not so much as a casual endearment flung my way.'

As I'd hoped, Connie puts aside her own upset and grins sympathetically. 'I saw them in the playground, they did seem really settled. Running around like crazy. I think it was a good idea to stagger the drop-off on the first day so it wasn't too overwhelming for the new starters.'

'You mean new parents, don't you?'

'Yes.' She smiles, more relaxed now.

I turn away from Connie and busy myself with making the coffee so I can ask the next question with some dignity. 'Did you see Peter and Lucy drop Auriol off this morning?'

Because, here's the thing. In among the several million crimes against me that my bleep bleep ex-husband has committed, this one possibly takes the prize. He and his hussy mistress – oh, OK then, his wife – have decided to send their child to my school. My school! Well, of course, when I say my school,

I mean the boys' school. Hello? Isn't anything sacrosanct? Well, no, obviously not. With her form I can't imagine Lucy being squeamish about moving in on my school turf.

I thought I'd be safe. I never thought Lucy would choose the state school route for her daughter. Peter and Lucy both work in the City and earn shedloads. They could easily afford a posh little school with incredible alumni.

Sebastian and Henry's school is gorgeous. It does really well in the league tables and there's a marvellous playground; it's almost impossible to get a school with grass in London, yet this one has enormous trees with preservation orders. I'd carefully researched school catchment areas even before I conceived. I insisted Peter and I bought in a particular road to guarantee that we'd get our kids into Holland House. Then several years later, after Lucy had stolen my husband and destroyed my family, the woman had the cheek to announce that she thought it would be nice for Auriol to go to the same school as her big brothers.

Curse the cow.

This had to be a calculated move to hurt me. And it did hurt me, which is astounding because I'd thought that I was already dead to pain that she could inflict, slain by a thousand cuts. Their house in Holland Park isn't even in catchment, but Lucy visited the school and charmed the pants off Mr Walker, the headmaster (and I may mean literally, who knows with that conniving she-devil?). She spun the tale of how it was such a good idea for Sebastian and Henry because they ought to be close to their sister. Cow, bitch, witch. How dare she? As if she cares about the boys' welfare. If she did, then she wouldn't have slept with my husband, while pretending to be my friend, would she? And Auriol is not their sister. She is a half sister, which is a very important distinction. They have a father in common and nothing more, and what does that mean really? All Peter had to do to earn the title of father was get me up the duff and that simply wasn't too taxing, whatever he might claim now.

It's not like he's had to mop their tiny bodies with cold flannels to bring down temperatures when they were babies, nor has he once applied calamine lotion to a single chicken-pox spot. He hasn't ever taken them to the dentist, the doctor or the optician. He hasn't yet cut nails or hair. He hasn't packed lunches. He does not do their homework with them. He does not have their friends to his house for tea. He does not sew labels into their uniforms. He does not answer their questions on death or bullies.

He does play football with them on Sunday mornings, he bought them Game Boy Advance and introduced them to their first love – Sonic – and he does take them on holiday to Cornwall once a year. It's not that he's a terrible father, in fact he's quite a good father; I'm just saying being a father isn't that tricky, is it? Least not from where I'm standing.

It's not that I have anything against little Auriol, either. She's actually a fairly sweet child, especially considering she's handicapped with the most evil mother known to the western world since Snow White's stepmother. But really . . . the school! Isn't it enough for the woman that she has my husband and I don't have a husband at all, mine or anyone else's? She has silky blonde hair, pert breasts, long legs, lots of cash and more shoes in her wardrobe than Russell & Bromley stock each season. While I have red frizzy hair, breasts that schoolboys would describe as bazookas and fat legs that have so many varicose veins popping and swelling that I look like I'm wearing the tube map. Lucy is a woman comfortable in her skin (although in my opinion she ought to be wearing sackcloth and ashes and beating herself soundly every day). I'm basically a nice enough person who lacks confidence, marked talents and sometimes even a sense of humour. I guess because I can give such a realistic account of us both I understand why my husband left me for her.

But I did have the school. That was my territory. I am class rep this year. A position I've done my time to earn. I always volunteer to take the kids on trips when the teachers need an extra pair of hands. I was solely responsible for the cake stall at the summer fair and for two years in a row I sold more raffle tickets than any other mother for the Christmas tombola. I'm known and liked at Holland House. The school gate is my social life, my haven in times of need and where I get a buzz. That's important. That's sacred. It should be untouchable.

I say none of this. I take a deep breath, turn to Connie with two full cups of coffee and a wide grin and repeat my question. ‘So did you happen to see Peter and Lucy at the gate this morning?’

‘No. Eva, the latest nanny, dropped Auriol off.’

‘I hope she settles,’ I say with a smile.

I can’t quite meet Connie’s eye so I concentrate on blowing my coffee to cool it off. I do hope the little girl settles. I wouldn’t want any kid to be unsettled. But, on the other hand, if she doesn’t settle they might move her to another school. I wish her well but mostly I wish her well away.

Connie reaches to squeeze my arm. ‘Are you OK with Auriol coming to Holland House, Rose? It’s not an easy situation.’

‘Oh, it’s fine,’ I lie.

‘I feel a little bit to blame. I always think that Lucy was influenced to move to Holland Park after Luke and I moved to Notting Hill.’

Connie is a lovely girl but a bit self-centred, and she does hold a general belief that the whole world revolves around her and that everyone’s actions are a result of, or a reaction to, her own. To be fair, she is aware of this trait in herself and, more often than not, fights it.

‘Or maybe she just moved here to piss you off,’ she adds with a grin.

‘Maybe, but she hasn’t. It’s great that the boys are just around the corner from their dad if they ever need him.’

I lie convincingly now. I used to be hopeless at telling the littlest white fib but all skills can be developed with practice.

‘Yes. I guess he can drop in any time,’ adds Connie.

I nod and refrain from pointing out that he never has. Instead, I offer her another biscuit and ask if she managed to buy Fran a book bag. They’ve been hard to get hold of – the school outfitter miscalculated demand.

‘Yes, got it. Am I supposed to sew a label on to it or can I just write her name on the flap thing?’

‘You need to sew a label on the handle. It should be initial and then surname, in blue. Times New Roman font,’ I reply confidently. My feet well and truly on terra firma.

Connie stays for an hour but I can’t persuade her to stay for lunch. She even resists my offer of home-baked bread and soup.

‘Are you sure? It’s organic. Over six different vegetables in it. I made a huge batch for the boys, too huge as it turned out. We didn’t manage to eat it all.’

‘Rose, you put me to shame. Fran and Flora never get to eat like that. My idea of a healthy meal is a bowl of pasta and some frozen peas,’ she says. ‘Can we come round for our tea one day this week so that they get a few veggies and something organic inside them?’

I laugh and we agree to have tea together on Thursday. I assume and hope Connie is exaggerating her lack of skills in the kitchen. It’s true that historically cooking has not been one of her talents, but surely she knows that she has a responsibility to the children now. Hasn’t every mum converted to organic produce? I start to tell her how simple it is to make soup, but I don’t even get as far as explaining the most efficient way to prepare and freeze stock when I see her eyes glaze over.

‘You know, I always just buy the cubes,’ she comments, as she hugs me goodbye and makes for the door.

I remember the day when there was nothing easier on this earth than persuading Connie to waste time. She was the undisputed queen of sloth. Of course, that was when she was pretending to be a management consultant. Now she is a photographer and runs her own business. As yet her photography business isn’t making her millions but it’s clear that the job satisfaction she gets from her work is priceless. At least she no longer resents her husband for enjoying his work as an architect.

After Connie leaves I wash the breakfast pots and then clean the house from top to bottom. I congratulate myself as I manage to dust on top of wardrobes and vacuum under the beds. I spend over two hours tidying the boys’ bedroom. It is extraordinary how time flies when you’re sorting Lego bricks into different colours and sizes. I do a basket of ironing and put on two loads of washing. One is drying at the moment. I’ll iron that tonight while I’m watching TV. I make a ham quiche and peel the vegetables for tea.

At 3.15 p.m. I put on a dab of lipgloss and set off to school. I feel a bit guilty. I should have made more of an effort with my appearance. Some of the mums always arrive at the school gate with full make-up and the latest high-street must-haves. But, then again, they have men over four feet tall to make an effort for.

I can't imagine Sebastian or Henry noticing whether I'm wearing the latest fashion statement or an old favourite peach M & S T-shirt; one that's been comfortable in my wardrobe for a decade. I'm more of a slummy mummy than a yummy mummy.

That said, although it is only a short walk to the school (literally two minutes) and it's a sunny afternoon, I don't leave the house without finding a cardigan. The sight of my wobbly, flabby arms is not something I want to share. I'm a size sixteen, or eighteen in the less generous brands. I've been this size since I got pregnant and this doesn't bother me at all. Or at least it doesn't bother me enough to make me want to do anything about it. I hate diets, and the only exercise I enjoy is walking the dog, which I do regularly. I do this more for the good of my heart than my figure, though. I've never been skinny. My wedding dress was a size fourteen and had to be let out a little around the bust. I suppose the difference is in those days my bust made men trip over their tongues, while now my boobs hang so low the only person that's likely to trip on them is me.

It's a very pleasant afternoon; rather more summer than autumn because the seasons no longer know when to change. When I was a girl you were guaranteed golden leaves underfoot almost the moment you pulled your school tie out of the wardrobe but it's not the same now. Everything is topsy-turvy. I saw crocuses sprouting in Hyde Park this August. I sometimes think the whole world is going mad. I hurry along the path worrying whether the boys are likely to have lost their blazers if they've taken them off.

As I approach the school gate I see two or three mums already clustering and my pulse quickens. I like this time of day. In the mornings, at drop-off, none of us have time to chat; we're all a little too harassed. In the afternoons I get my dose of adult company. I notice that all the other mums have younger siblings with them. Some in arms and strollers, others pulling on skirt hems. My arms feel empty and for a moment I don't know what to do with them.

We swap pleasantries; catching up on news about where people have been on their hols, comparing which after-school clubs we've enrolled our children in this term and suggesting dates for tea visits.

'Did you get away this summer, Rose?' asks Lauren Taylor. A mum of three, her eldest daughter is in the twins' year. Her middle one's in reception and the youngest is in the stroller.

'Yes. We hired a gîte in the South of France with my sister and her husband.'

'Oh, I'm so pleased. I was thinking of you and wondering how you manage over the hols. Six weeks can be a long time on your own.'

People often assume I am lonely. Even relative strangers feel compelled to say, 'It must be very hard on your own,' cue sympathetic look. Pity is something I've become accustomed to. Accustomed to but not anaesthetized. It's meant to make me feel better. It doesn't. The exact words may vary marginally; there might be a seasonal twist – ‘It must be hard to be on your own during the holidays/Christmas/your birthday’ – but the sense that they feel sorry for me is the same. I’m always stunned by comments such as these. How can I be considered to be on my own when I have twin seven-year-old boys, a dog, a rabbit, two goldfish, a full complement of parents, out-laws (the fond name I give my ex in-laws), friends, a younger sister, a brother-in-law, a large rambling garden and a small crumbling house? All of whom/which depend upon me for sustenance, maintenance, guidance, a ready supply of opinions (if only to reject them), walking, weeding, painting, cleaning, etc.

Although it is worth noting that I haven’t had sex for over half a decade. This does niggle me from time to time. I comfort myself that there’s no point in lamenting the lack of sex. Even if opportunity knocked, I’m not sure I was ever any good at it and I’m pretty convinced that if I was, I wouldn’t be now. I’ve forgotten what goes where.

Lauren continues. ‘I was tearing my hair out towards the end of the summer and counting the minutes Mark was at the office. The moment he walked through the door I’d yell at him, “Your turn, I’ve had them all day.”’ Lauren says this without any intention to be rude or malicious. She’s simply stating what every happily married mother thinks. ‘I can’t wait until Chrissie starts nursery school next year. Last one off my hands. The new nirvana is an empty house.’

‘You shouldn’t wish it away,’ I tell her, sourly.

She looks mildly chastised and I'm pathetic enough to feel chuffed by this; it evens the score after her comment about the certainty of my being lonely. I know motherhood shouldn't be a competition but it often feels as though it is. I do like Lauren a lot, however, so I resist adding that my best days are the ones when the boys are around me; days when they are drowning me in their noise and mess, because I know she'll be floored with guilt.

I feel down as I suddenly realize that today has been the strain, not the holidays.

'Maybe you could come over for Sunday lunch one weekend. It's no fun having a Sunday alone,' offers Lauren. And maybe I would have accepted except that she adds, 'Not this Sunday though, we have Phil and Gail Carpenter and their kids coming over. They have a girl in year one and the boy is in year four. Do you know them? Anyway it might be better if you come one weekend when it's not all couples. I think you'll be more comfortable. Maybe when my Mark is working away? What do you think?'

I think I want to punch her but I smile and lie, 'I'm sorry Lauren. I'm booked up every weekend from now till Christmas.'

Luckily, at that moment I catch sight of the boys snaking their way out of the classroom and across the playground, so I make my excuses and move forward to collect them.

The boys are mortified that I've picked them up and point out that they can walk home in minutes and I can practically see them from my bedroom window if I choose. I incense them further because I waste (their words) precious minutes that could have been spent watching TV (not if I get my way) by chatting to Mr Walker, the head. He's always visible at dropping-off and picking-up times so that the parents can grab him for a moment's gripe or grovelling. He also asks about our holiday but without the pity Lauren interjected into the conversation. The boys kick the pavement throughout the brief interlude and I whisper threats about confiscating favourite toys unless they are civil. When we do walk home they insist I trail behind them, keeping a distance of at least ten paces so their friends don't think they are babies. But they are my babies.

As I mosey behind them I consider my lie to Lauren. I know it was motivated by pique. My one bugbear about being single is that married couples never invite you anywhere. They don't want to draw attention to the fact that you are a spare part, not because it embarrasses the single person but because it embarrasses the cosy couples, who on the whole don't know what to do with unwanted wives. Where, oh where to put them?

Still, I know Lauren well enough to trust that she wasn't trying to be offensive in any way, she's just tactless. I sometimes think I live with shackles of tactlessness. Great iron chains that I lug around with me. These chains grow more hefty, awkward and burdensome as friends, relatives and strangers make unintentionally offensive comments and then I have to live with the emotional weight of their remarks.

But then again maybe I'm just touchy. Maybe I should ring Lauren and tell her that a date has freed up in November. It would be nice to go somewhere different for Sunday lunch. Daisy and Simon come to me about once a fortnight and Connie and Luke invite me to theirs reasonably frequently. Luckily, Luke is a far superior cook to Connie. But they have busy lives of their own and I can't impose myself on them all the time. The boys are often with Peter on a Sunday and those Sundays are the worst. Relentless. Evil.

Yes, I'll call Lauren.

Lucy

I am at my desk by 7.45 a.m. I check the Dow, the FTSE and the Nikkei. I linger on the Bloomberg site to get a measure of what the markets have been doing overnight. The US Stock-Index Futures are little changed ahead of rumours that consumer confidence is down and there'll be a slowing of personal spending. There's always rumours, most of which are initiated by traders. The important thing is to be able to effectively, efficiently and faultlessly separate fact from fiction. I keep reading and soon find what I'm hoping to see. European stocks advanced, led by semiconductor makers, including Infineon Technologies AG, and Micron Technology Inc. – in the US – unexpectedly posted a fiscal fourth-quarter profit after markets closed.

Unexpectedly for some, maybe, but I'd seen it coming and had taken a punt. I can almost smell my bonus. I calculate that the pleasantly surprising earnings from Micron signal good news for tech stocks, there's demand out there and the companies could perform better than the market had previously thought. I immediately check my clients' portfolios and decide what to sell and what to hold on to.

I feel I'm on rock solid ground in the office. I adore my job, everything about it. I like numbers and I like money, which is a good start. But I also relish the fact that I'm a bloody excellent trader and I wield enormous respect among my colleagues; all the more glorious as it is grudgingly given.

I started as a graduate trainee with Gordon Webster Handle, one of the City's most respected and established institutions. I soon discovered that respected and established are euphemisms for ball-breakingly tough and sexist, but oddly that environment didn't intimidate me, I found it challenging. Eight graduates started together. All, except me, were Oxbridge graduates. All, except me and one other, were men. The other woman trader no longer works. She married one of the few dotcom multi-millionaires who managed to turn his idea into hard cash just before the dotcom dream turned into a nightmare. One of the other guys has had a breakdown and I understand that he spends his time on a Buddhist retreat in India. The other five are all still trading, although I'm the only one still at Gordon Webster Handle. A couple of them live in NY now, which by all accounts is amazing – pure adrenalin the entire time. Sadly, not a rush I'm ever likely to experience. A move abroad isn't an option for me now, as Peter needs to live near his sons. Still, I like it here. They appreciate me.

When we used to keep track of such things I regularly earned the highest bonus among my original gang of trainees. A fact none of us has ever got over.

As Jeremy (the self-appointed cocky bastard in the group) pointed out the first time it happened, ‘Thing is, Lucy, it’s unexpected. You might be the best trader among us but you still have a vag. I thought that alone would cost you twenty or thirty grand.’

‘It is rare to see a case of best man wins,’ I laughed, ‘especially when the best man is a woman.’

Although admittedly things have changed. Since I had my daughter, Auriol, my bonuses have regularly been ten to fifteen per cent lower than my lowest bonus pre-Auriol. It appears I was able to hide my gender until I actually gave birth, then it became impossible, which is not surprising. However, I clearly remember the days when our bonuses were announced and I was the acknowledged hot-shot. Best days of my life. Up there with meeting Peter, graduating with a first, getting married and rather more special than the day I gave birth.

Sorry, but I simply don’t buy into all that crap about the day you drop the sprog being the best in your life. It’s a messy, bloody, terrifying and painful day. Even though I had an elective Caesarean with a mobile epidural it was still an uncomfortable and undignified affair. People feed themselves such bullshit. I accept that the day your kid walks or smiles for the first time is pretty special, but the day you give birth? Pleeease.

I’m not a mother-earth type. I did not enjoy my enormous belly, giving up alcohol or the wardrobe restrictions of pregnancy. Of course, I did the whole gestating thing beautifully. I ate very little so as to keep my weight down, which infuriated my obstetrician, but I was paying him terrifically so I bought the privilege of ignoring his advice. Besides, Auriol was a healthy 7lb at birth so what harm? Getting my figure back was very easy. I have no patience with these women who grumble that they have no time to drag their lardy asses down to the gym – I have two words to say to them: ‘Maternity Nurse’. OK, so they cost, but what better excuse for returning to work than pleading that all your money is spent on your child? Am I ranting? How unbecoming. I sheepishly look around the office and am relieved to see that my rant has been internal.

I take a few calls, respond to the most urgent e-mails, those from senior bods and those who are in different time zones, and then I turn back to the markets. Shares of chemical makers BASF AG and Bayer AG rose yesterday, as crude oil fell for the first day in three. Good, as I’d hoped. The Dow Jones Stoxx 600 Index added 0.4 per cent to 297.44, with all the benchmark’s eighteen industry groups gaining, except the Oil & Gas Index. Just as predicted. I pat myself on the back. I’m so good at what I do it’s almost possible to forget how phenomenally risky my work is. Still, if the City is full of gamblers, I’m the addict who can count cards and has a photographic memory. I always leave the casino with pockets full of chips.

At 9.15 a.m. a reminder pops on to my screen drawing me away from my figures. I send Peter an e-mail.

Auriol will be walking through the school gates right now. I wish I was there with her. Love you.

In fact I'm not absolutely certain if she started at quarter to or quarter past nine but Pete will be none the wiser either. It's not that I actually needed to be reminded that my daughter is starting school today; I just didn't want to get caught up in something else and not pause in order to send Pete the e-mail. This show of thoughtfulness is a good move. I sometimes get the impression that he thinks I'm not quite up to scratch with the whole mothering thing. Which is dreadful. I hate not being up to scratch.

Of course, I love my daughter as much as the next woman. I worship her. She's bright, pretty, and largely well-behaved, except when she is being unimaginably horrid. I just don't go in for overly sentimental displays of affection. Because really that's all they are, displays. And I'm not big on self-sacrifice either. Or crusty noses. Or endlessly retelling the same story. Or answering non-sequential 'why' questions. Or sitting in a circle with other mums singing songs and clapping. Or a number of things that society seems to insist come with motherhood.

Not that Pete's ever actually said that he thinks I'm lacking maternal instinct. He wouldn't dare. He knows he wouldn't live to regret such a comment. Even if it's true, I don't take criticism well. He did get a little tetchy last night when he was filling out various administrative forms for Auriol's new school – forms about allergies and permission to take the children on trips, that sort of thing. I didn't know the name of her doctor and so he threw a mini hissy fit. He flung the pen down on to the table and said impatiently, 'For God's sake, Lucy.'

I responded by slowly looking up from Newsweek and turning to him, pointing out, 'You don't know the name of her doctor either.'

'But you're her mother.'

'And you're her father. I work the same hours you do, often longer. It's Eva's job to know these things, not mine.'

Wisely, Pete recognized that the conversation was closed. I'm not a bad mother, I simply have a unique style.

I look up from my desk and say loudly, 'I have to go to Starbucks. Can I get anyone a coffee? I can't settle, my little girl starts school today.'

'Really? I didn't know you had any kids,' says my boss, Ralph.

He just happened to be passing when I made the offer of coffee. He's quite new, sent here from the NY office six weeks ago. I'm still trying to get the measure of him. Normally it would be utterly crazy to make a big issue of being a mum in this office (asking for time off because of kids' ill-health, or similar, is suicidal), but Ralph has been a little bit too friendly on the last couple of occasions that the team has gone for a social and I think it's time to remind him that I'm married and have a family. This is one of the few times when being a mummy comes in useful. Marriage or even motherhood isn't usually much of an obstacle to an affair for most City types, but as my new boss is American he's a little more traditional and hopefully will stop touching my arm and waist when he talks to me now. Of course, there is the risk he'll stop talking to me altogether. Most men think women have lobotomies at the Portland Hospital, not Caesareans.

'Education is the most important heritage we can offer. Which school is she going to?' asks Mick, another trader on my floor. He's childless, so I can't imagine he's really interested, just programmed to have the last word.

'Holland House in Holland Park.'

'I don't know that one.'

'You wouldn't. It's state.'

I must be the only trader in history who has opted to send my kid to a state school. Publicly, I pass this off as a socially responsible decision. I argue, where would the state system be if all the middle-class parents, who care about education, pulled their kids out of the state schools? Of course those schools would sink down the league tables. There's plenty of evidence to back up this viewpoint, and it has a certain 'lefty' cachet that's very of the moment and that I rather enjoy. As it happens, I was educated at one of the best independent schools for girls in the country and I had hoped Auriol would be following in my footsteps. The boaters were adorable and Latin comes in useful when you want to slap down jumped-up 'lads'. But Rose put paid to any designs I had.

Besides paying for Auriol's schooling, Pete and I would happily have funded the twins through independent schools but would Rose have it? No, she would not. It's my belief that she rather likes to play the single mum card. She goes out of her way to make it look as though Pete's not quite doing his duty, not quite coughing up enough cash, or time, or thought. That's why she sold up their family home, even though he'd paid off the mortgage for her. She searched high and low to find the smallest residence in Holland Park (although notably, she didn't give up Holland Park altogether, did she?). All that nonsense she spouts about her planning for a time when she'll have no income at all, once the boys are grown, and needing the capital from the house as a nest-egg, blah blah. My question is why can't she just get a job, like everyone else? I'm a mother and I work. I don't wait for someone else to dole it out to me. Oh blast, just thinking about the woman is enough to bring on a headache.

It was so silly and emotive of her to insist that Pete and I offering to pay school fees was 'guilt money'. Nonsense. He just wants the best for them. I think at that point in the discussion she said something offensive about not wanting them to grow up to be pompous, social-climbing twits as most public schoolboys are. It doesn't take a genius to guess who she was having a pop at when she said that. She said she believed the children would be just as well educated at the local state school and added that private education is a waste of money and only for parents who splash out cash as a substitute for time or emotion. Easy for her to say as she lives in Holland Park; of course the state schools are terrific there. Pete and I lived in Soho at the time, where education is considered an inconvenient interruption to a life of crime and vandalism. But somehow Rose got the upper hand. The way she told it made it appear virtuous to send your kids to state school and positively evil to educate independently. I feel so terribly out of sync. Spending on education used to be considered wise, a privilege yes, but not a source of shame. Certainly better than spending on handbags or curtains. Now the opposite is true.

Of course I couldn't send Auriol to a private school while Henry and Sebastian were attending the 'lovely little state school, just around the corner'. If I'd done that I would have played directly into Rose's hands. We'd never have heard the last of the disparity between the children. God, Rose is irritating.

So, we had to move. Somehow Pete persuaded me that it would be a good idea to move nearer to Rose and the boys. 'Much friendlier.' Again I'm not à la mode. I don't want to be so very twenty-first-century about our irregular family. I'm actually happier with the role of wicked stepmother; at least one isn't fettered with annoying expectations. We aren't one great big happy family. He divorced her; that shows a certain amount of dissatisfaction with the relationship, wouldn't you agree? I'm quite keen for us to settle into a state of active dislike bordering on loathsome anger. I don't want to be one step away from polygamy, which is what staying pally with the ex amounts to.

I'm not exactly sure how it happened; I was dealing with a big project in Hong Kong and by the time I got home Pete had made an offer on a house just round the corner from Rose's, instructed a conveyancer and solicitor and all but booked the removal van. Good God, had the man lost his mind? No, I admit I hadn't read his e-mails especially carefully; it was a very busy time. And yes, when I did check his messages I did find a series of increasingly frantic notes forwarding details of the house he'd found us and asking if I was happy for him to progress with buying it. OK, I confess, I might have vaguely mumbled that I agreed it would be sensible for Pete to live near the boys but I hadn't meant it.

I take comfort in the fact that the house he chose for us is enormous. Not quite as enormous as the one he and Rose used to own, but people forget, we do have two families to support now. So, once ensconced in Holland Park, there seemed no reasonable alternative – the children are all now at the same school. Mr Walker, the headmaster, was a poppet. He was eating out of my hand after just one meeting. Auriol leapfrogged the waiting list, even though strictly speaking we are a tiny bit outside the catchment area. Nothing untoward, we just evoked the sibling priority rule.

In fact, Holland Park is quite fun. Not so desperately of the moment as Soho, where I lived as a bachelor girl, but I've done the late bars, twenty-four-hour shops and the minimalist home thing – it's very over. Holland

Park is unquestionably appropriate for this stage of my life. You can't flick your hair without hitting an organic pâtisserie or a children's yoga centre. And it is a total joy that Connie and Luke are just around the corner in Notting Hill. Despite my reputation as Ice Queen, even I admit that there's nothing sweeter on this earth than watching Connie's daughter, Fran, play with Auriol. Besides, Auriol does adore her big brothers; especially Sebastian, who looks most like his father – he grew out of his red-haired stage. Henry still has Rose's colouring – summers are a curse for him.

I just hope the school does the job. If not, I'll have her out of there before the end of the academic year, but I can't imagine I'll have much to worry about; after all, Auriol's genes are phenomenal – she'll be straight As all the way. I wonder if she'll be Mary or the Angel Gabriel in the school nativity? Mary doesn't get to say much but she is on stage all the time. But the Angel Gabriel normally has a darling costume. I must give that some thought and then put my recommendation to Mr Walker.

Right now I'd better go and buy those double espressos.
